What's New in the PopSel?

Search for information on the Internet with Google without leaving your desktop and without having to install any third-party applications. While Google Chrome is already available for Linux, this small and simple application does not show any signs of joining the group, but more likely, of leaving it. Basic design: * Web pages open in new tabs * Load all cached pages while browsing * Add new shortcuts to the start menu * Search for information on the Internet The application is pretty basic, with a simple layout and an interface that could be a major plus if you don't feel like installing anything on your system. Despite that, a remote Google search feature does not require any proxy for work, a neat added feature indeed. From the help file: The application uses Google's server to complete a search. It then downloads cached pages and displays them all in tabs. This being said, you can't select a way to show content while browsing, simply because the content is simply displayed, but you can download all cached pages so you can see them afterwards, just like a real browser. The search result simply opens on a web page, so nothing special here. Pressing the help button opens an interesting manual and an exported help file. Basic usage:

- * Add a shortcut to your start menu
- * Pick one of the options available (search through pages, search words, query parameters or searches)
- * Add local content (including web pages)
- * Configure parameters for the search

You can add up to three shortcuts to your start menu and four to the desktop. Choosing one of the options lets you search through content on the web or a local file. Adding local content requires a simple selection and a field for the contents. While the search option does not require any particular setting, it is nevertheless a must for any search. Selecting a language allows to select a region and a specific setting for Google, without which searches might show localized versions or temporary ads. Exploring the settings: * Choose a language * Select the search region * Set options for the search A similar amount of configuration can be made for the local content, including for the list of parameters to consider. Searching for information on the web: * Choose the search criteria * Choose the language * Select an option for searching (web results, cached pages, images or videos) * Add parameters Adding parameters is a simple affair, as you can enter them as
