AutoCAD provides an interactive GUI called the "Command Window" or "Program Editor". It allows users to enter commands and data using a specialized language called AutoLISP. Using the command line, users can script automation actions in AutoLISP. Users can choose from over two dozen commands, many of which are available through AutoLISP's batch processing methods. AutoLISP commands come with an accompanying help file that contains examples of how to use each command. The built-in help system is linked with the AutoCAD command language and is easily referenced using a keyboard shortcut. AutoCAD integrates the command line into the interface by allowing users to access the command line from the "Program Editor" and the command window (shown in the figure below). We present the results of a full-atom molecular dynamics simulation of the X-ray diffraction data of apoferritin. By simulating the data set of a high-resolution crystal structure, we are able to determine atomic-level interactions between amino acid residues of the protein shell. The simulations indicate that the inter-protein contacts stabilize the atomic structure of the protein. The data are therefore consistent with the view that protein-protein contacts are critical to the preservation of protein structure.КИЕВ. 13 февраля. РИА Новости/ТАСС. Белорусский зав ca3bfb1094
