I updated to the latest version yesterday, and it started this morning. None of the changes I made in any of the software seems to be the problem. All of the other computers in the lab do the same thing when I do any type of modifications. I am just trying to get it fixed. Does anybody have any suggestions, or maybe a fix for this new problem? Please help, Regards, Brandon A: Have you checked to see if you have the latest version of AutoData? There was a problem with an older version causing it to act up on the workstations and it was fixed in an update last Friday or Monday. Q: Is it possible to store a single value in the browser cache using javascript? I have a web app and need to cache some static data (the page layout, etc.) in the browser when the user navigates away from the page and returns. I want the user to be prompted only once, so I'd like to avoid asking for the initial value at each request. I'd like to use Javascript only, because I need it to be cross-browser, work in offline mode and be embedded in a client tool. Is there a way to do this? A: You can use the HTML5 localStorage to store key/values pairs that persist through browser close/reopen, because they use Web Storage. To store a single value, you can use a specially crafted key/value pair: localStorage["user-modified-on-%.do"] = "yesterday" A: I haven't used it before, but you could use WebStorage.
