The evidence showed that the form was read to Rojas in Spanish, and he signed it in the presence of several witnesses after the agents informed him of his rights. Considering the totality of the circumstances, we agree that the consent to search was voluntary. 13 In any event, the additional physical evidence discovered during the search of the van was not suppressed. Even if Rojas' consent to search had been invalid, the discovery was not caused by the search. Rather, the officer who searched the van spotted the guns as he was conducting a drug sweep of the van in order to look for contraband that might have been dropped. When the officer saw the guns, he alerted his colleagues and they recovered the weapons. 14 Rojas also contends that his rights under the Sixth Amendment and the Compulsory Process Clause were violated by the prosecution's failure to disclose, prior to trial, the identity and whereabouts of the confidential informant. This claim is not properly before us. Rojas did not move for a continuance or a mistrial, nor did he move to compel disclosure. See United States v. Cepeda-Rios, 989 F.2d 160, 162 (9th Cir.1993). We therefore decline to review this claim. Id. IV 6d1f23a050
